Now more than ever, the modern defensive carbine needs to function at its peak in all conditions and situations. Lights and laser designators have deservedly found a home on countless AR platform rifles, but point of impact shifts due to legacy mil-spec handguard designs have limited their effectiveness in the past. Midwest Industries new Night Fighter Handguard has been specifically designed for shooters engaging targets in low light scenarios. Built to reduce point of aim shifts with popular lasers like the ATPIAL, DBAL, and NGAL, these handguards are constructed around a sturdy 2.250" long steel barrel nut while still retaining a slim 1.5" outside diameter.
